A ball of fire

It is believed that Earth is about 4.6 billion years old. Scientists think that it formed from a cloud of gas, dust and rock that was around our sun. These materials came together and formed a ball of fire and liquid rock. At that time, Earth's surface wasn't hard because the temperature was so hot that minerals couldn't crystalize. After millions of years, Earth cooled down. The surface became a layer of solid rock, called the crust. This is the part of Earth that we live on. The crust is usually about 30 kilometres thick on land, but it's thinner at the bottom of the ocean. Under Earth's crust, there's a layer called the mantle. It's about 2,900 kilometres thick. The mantle is very hot - its temperature is about 3,000 degrees centigrade. It's mostly made of liquid rock, called magma. Earth's core is under the mantle, at the centre of the planet. The core measures about 3,500 kilometres across and it's mostly made of two metals - iron and nickel. The outer core is liquid, but the inner core is solid. That's because the other layers push down on the inner core with incredible pressure. Although temperatures in the inner core can be more than 6,000 degrees centigrade, the pressure prevents the iron from melting.

Microwaves

Microwave ovens use some amazing physics to cook your food. Unlike regular ovens that cook by circulating hot air, microwave ovens blast your food with radio waves. The idea was invented when a scientist who was experimenting with radio waves noticed that his chocolate bar, which was in his pocket, had melted. Seeing this, he realised that radio waves could cook food and invented the microwave oven. The microwave oven uses a magnetron. It creates a fast-flipping magnetic field that forces water molecules in food to spin. These rotating molecules bump into each other, creating friction that raises the temperature of food. This method of cooking is very fast – around six times faster than a normal oven – making microwave ovens very energy efficient. What is more, only the food or liquid (and the container it's in) gets heated in a microwave oven, not the oven itself, which is safe for children. However, microwaves can't heat food above the boiling temperature of water so it happens that your food either becomes hard and dried out or soft and wet.
